Not illustrated. 1859 Excerpt: .take no less; sell it or never sell it, buy it who will. Here, shouted a man in the crowd, pushing his way up to the van, with sixpence in his hand. He had no sooner got the knife, than he began to praise it aloud, said it was dirt cheap; and, having thus performed his part, walked away. The man on the platform now held up another knife like the last, exclaiming-- Just one more. Why, I thought you said you only had one? a lad called out. O, you foolish young dog, cried Cheap John. I said, Mister Rogers only sent me one as a sample; but I, immediately, ordered twelve gross on em. Here, here, called several in the crowd, and the vendor sold a great number of them; bawling out, at the receipt of each sixpence, Sold again, sold again--I say, sold again. I examined one of the knives and found it to be of the description sold in Sheffield at three shillings-and-sixpence a dozen. A pair of braces were next offered, and were declared to be long enough and strong enough to tow a ship into harbour; none were sold. A pair of glass salt-cellars came next, and were recommended as being so immensely thick and strong, that they were used by their present owner for blocking the wheels of his van, when his horse rested in ascending a hill! Sixpence was the price of the pair, but very few were...
